Data is often communicated in the form of packets, which are transmitted from a source entity to a destination entity via the network. One or more packets may travel along a single path between the source entity and the destination entity. In some circumstances, multiple packets will be simultaneously received at a destination entity from a single source entity, e.g., due to multiple paths between the source entity and the destination entity. If multiple packets are received at the destination entity from the same source entity, it may be necessary to determine a packet to which the packet(s) belong(s). For example, in some situations, the source entity may send to the destination entity a number of packets from the same source entity, and the packets may need to be combined and delivered to the same destination entity. In some situations, it may be difficult to determine whether a packet is intended for the destination entity. For example, in some situations, a source entity may send to a destination entity a number of packets from the same source entity. Due to transmission delays, there may be a time between a time at which a packet is sent by a source entity to a destination entity and a time at which the packet is received at the destination entity. Because packets from the same source entity arrive at the destination entity at different times, the packets may be received at the destination entity at different times.1.
