The duality of Truths, or the three faces of Donald Trump - pajju ===== glangdale In an ideal world, the "comfort zone" of the individual can be significantly raised by finding people who share one's interests and understanding them, and can be significantly lowered by finding people who share one's interests but with whom one can't understand. For better and for worse, leaders are the people who can make those moves. The article points to a number of people who are among the latter. ~~~ personlurking I think the first sentence of the article makes a much bigger point than the last; "Trump's campaign manager, Corey Lewandowski, said he often felt "out of sync" with his manager." ~~~ InclinedPlane That's not really the first sentence of the article. The first sentence is "Where did Donald Trump come from? Who is the man behind all those ideas, statements, tweets and interviews? What's driving this man?" It's not in the slightest bit surprising that he hasn't done much in the way of winning over people who just won't accept him. He's a very strong reactionary. He's an insult comedian. He says outrageous things with the uttermost confidence (because the chances of those things being true are remote). He's Trump. He's the best political communicator in the Republican Party. He's the best at manipulating media outlets and suckering idiots into supporting him. ~~~ natrius He's not an insult comedian, he's an insult comedian who appeals to the immigrant vote and he steals his propaganda style from Hitler. ~~~ sebastianconcept Yes, we also have to acknowledge that he's a racist. ~~~ semi-extrinsic "
