Post-operative and post-traumatic cerebellar bleeding. The aim of this study was to compare clinical and radiological characteristics of three types of post-operative/post-traumatic cerebellar hemorrhage. It is a retrospective study, over a 10-year period, of cases of cerebellar hemorrhage that required emergency care. The three groups of patients were subdivided according to the final diagnosis; hemorrhage from rupture of a cerebral vascular malformation (CVAM), from venous insufficiency (VI), and from infarction or thrombosis of the vein of Galen (TG). A total of 60 patients were included: 11.2% CVAM, 37.6% VI, and 50.0% TG. There were no statistically significant differences in clinical or radiological characteristics or outcome. Patients with CVAM had a longer time to hemorrhage. Non-hospitalized patients had a better outcome. In the group of TG, 10 patients (50%) were misdiagnosed initially. Cerebellar hemorrhage is a rare complication in the modern era, but it is the most important differential diagnosis when a patient presents with acute cerebellar signs and symptoms. The presence of a CVAM, or on the other hand, the tigroid pattern on CT scan, do not identify a specific pathology and an urgent cerebral CT scan should be performed. In patients that require a surgical procedure, CVAM and VI are treated the same way, whereas TG hemorrhage deserves a radiological search of the sella turcica and sub-occipital area. A study of cocaine self-administration under an interval-of-reinforcement or a random-selection procedure in rats. Male rats were trained to self-administer cocaine (0.5 mg/kg/infusion) under one of two procedures: an interval-of-reinforcement (IR) procedure (each injection was reinforced for a 10 s interval) or a random-selection (RS) procedure (injections were reinforced at the same time as they were given). Whereas cocaine self-administration was stable and dose-proportional under the IR procedure, self-administration under the RS procedure was unstable and exhibited a variety of dose-response curves. Under both procedures, cocaine self-administration was blocked by a number of pretreatments, including the irreversible antagonist D-amphetamine and the depolarizing GABA antagonist bicuculline. Conversely, pretreatments that enhanced responding for
