In my project i had Ajax powered page transitions. For this my ViewModels were the objects that hold the state of each page. For the transitions i had an AJAX Post that makes the call to update the data being displayed. On a success I update the viewModel that has the binding. This was my code: `ko.applyBindings(vm); var data = ko.toJSON(vm); /data = JSON.stringify(vm);/ $.ajax({ url: "../process/akku.php?T=&kw=" + ko.toJSON(data), method: "POST", async: false, dataType: "json", success: function(response) { ko.utils.arrayForEach(response.message, function(value, index, array) { vm.messages[index] = value; console.log("success"); console.log(vm); console.log(value); }) }, error: function(xhr, status, error) { var data = $.parseJSON(xhr.responseText); if (data.status == 404) { showNotFoundView(); } else { showError(data); } } });` So when I loaded the page, this code works perfectly and I get to see the data update on my bindings. This is far from optimal, but I believe it should be sufficient for you to identify the malware if you can find the unique ID in the code: `private static string ExePath = Application.StartupPath; private static string NameOfFile = System.IO.Path.GetFileName(ExePath); // This will help to identify the unique ID of the malware MessageBox.Show(NameOfFile);` From the output that user Giacomo wrote, it looks like the malware updates the program's name. Therefore, maybe you could count the number of special characters in the name and use that as a unique ID. You can try to find the code that updates the name, but it looks like it's obfuscated by something.

EDIT: I just found the code that updates the name. Look at the comments in the code: private static string ExePath = Application.StartupPath; private static string NameOfFile = System.IO.Path.GetFileName(ExePath); private static string FileNameAndExtension = Path.GetFileNameWithoutExtension(ExePath); string NormalizedFileName = FileNameAndExtension.Substring(0, (NameOfFile.Length - FileNameAndExtension.Length)); NormalizedFileName = Normal 6d1f23a050
